Republican Ag Commissioner Miller set to join Democratic nominee for his job for discussion on data centers

GOP Texas Agriculture Commissioner Sid Miller is set to join Democratic nominee for the job Clayton Tucker down on the coast for a bipartisan discussion on "large-scale data centers on Texas communities, water resources, and infrastructure."

Miller of course just lost the Republican nomination to businessman Nate Sheets, who had the backing of Gov. Greg Abbott, back in March.

The event in Bay City will be hosted next Thursday by a group called "Matagorda County Against Data Centers."

It's being called "The Cost of Data Centers" and will "bring together speakers from diverse backgrounds to discuss concerns about the rapid expansion of AI data centers across Texas, including their effects on water supplies, power infrastructure, rural communities, and local economies," per the announcement.

"This issue is bringing Texans together from all walks of life," Tucker said. "People may disagree on a lot of things, but they understand that our water, our land, and our communities should not be sacrificed so a handful of tech barons can get even richer."
